Appendix 1

1. To show brush lettering on stone, and the effect of
 - A. Rolling the brush into a stroke-entry
 - B. Lifting off the brush, as the stroke is pulled, to achieve a thinning 'tail'
 - C. Brushed letters on a poor-surfaced Pennant sandstone showing rolled entry into l and the effect of halting the stroke with the stock in full contact with the surface, at the finish of the bow of the e and the eg ligature bar, producing the clotting of paint that gives a lobed line end.

2. Light cursive letters written with a stylus in clay, showing the effect of stylus writing in wax. Looped entries are freely made.
 - A. Shows the ligaturing of 'e' and the square-footed turn out of the l which is a feature of Rustic written with a stylus.
 - B. Shows the extent to which curved strokes may be thrown with ease, in the b, and the ec ligature which we find transferred to stone in the period before the establishment of a canonical half-uncial.

3. Replica votive plaques cut in clay with a chip-carving knife. Once the clay was hard, it was possible to make foil impressions from the surface of the clay.

A. The alpha shows a different solution from the avoidance of a straight bar joining the diagonals.

B. The common solution of angle-bar alpha is shown in this example.

4. Rubbings of two examples of the letter I, cut in seasoned oak on vertical grain

A. With a stop at each end.

B. Without stops.

On a three-inch letter such as this, if the downstroke was not provided with stops, then the stroke ripped up the grain of the wood by about half an inch in each case.

5. Line endings knife-cut in wood.

A. Well-seasoned fine-grain pine showing the kind of pyramidal stop used by woodcarvers such as that found on the Lemanaghan bog staff.

2. Poor-quality softwood showing simple angled stops with a curved cut into the downstroke from each end.

6. Chip-carving techniques.

A. Lentoid bar chip-carving knife-cut in pine.

B. Angle-bar A chip-carving knife-cut in softwood.

7. Letter E shown

A. Cut in Quarella stone, to demonstrate the advantage of isolating the serifs from the secondary strokes.

B. Cut in pine down the grain, showing the sharpness of cut across the grain, and the relative softness down it.

8. Letter A shown

A. Knife-cut in steatite (Shetland soapstone), showing the clean detail possible without chisel work

B. A well-defined impression from the above in clay.

9. Rubbing from an Ogham inscription in Sutton stone, showing

A. The destruction of the arris, rendering the Ogham illegible when strokes are hammered right up to the edge.

B. An X-shaped Ogham character with the diagonals intersecting on the arris, showing similar destruction.

10. Experimental Ogham characters

A. In Sutton stone made by scoring rather than chiselling, resulting in less destruction of the arris.

B. Three Ogham strokes taken to the edge of an adamantine whinstone, made by violent chiselling. It was not possible to damage the arris.

11. Letters made using the bore and score technique, replicating the Brittany Beladore inscription

A. Isle of Man shaley slate. The surface of this stone makes it necessary to mark the ends of the letter-form first, to prevent slipping. Boring by drill or awl is an effective method of limiting the scores.

B. The same letters bored and scored in fine-quality Bethesda slate.

12. Letters cut with a round-end chisel in Bloomhill sandstone, from Clonmacnoise, showing the finish possible with a tool that is not sharp-edged.

A. Angular letters.

B. Serifed letters.

The bifurcated serif in B was made with no spalling at the junction with the bow of h. The angular letters of A were significantly easier and quicker to incise.

This illustration shows the elongation of form in bowed strokes that is characteristic of minuscule and Rustic capitals. ECMW no.32 has bows on the square plan, but ECMW no.35 has bows on the oblong plan.

DIPLOMATA : STANNINGTON

2.8. Military diploma from Stannington, Yorks., RIB no. 2401.6. Angular letterforms executed in chased strokes with a graver. An enlargement of a detail is shown in ILLUS. 5: 9.

6. Cut on a plank, not of oak, length 840 mm, width 186 mm, thickness 26 mm, used as walling in the west tower of the South Gate of the Flavian fort; precise date uncertain.

incised: III | I

1.2 is cut with a shorter blade.

Perhaps 'Four'

2444.7

8. On an oak plank lining a Flavian drain in the west tower of the South Gate.

cut with the grain: IIIIV

Presumably VIII retrograde, 'Nine'.

The plank carries nails not relevant to its function in the drain and was presumably re-used there. The context dates to the late 70s, and the plank may therefore have been cut at the foundation of the fort, c. A.D. 72-3.

10. On an oak off-cut found in a post-trench of Building [3858], length 610 mm, width 175 mm, thickness 115 mm.

cut across the grain: I or (?) V

The surface may have been trimmed down, removing half a V; compare the right-hand stroke of RIB 2444.17.

5: 13. The line-ends of ECMW no. 77, the Veracius inscription at Aberdaron. Showing the construction of a 'fish-tail' serif. To prevent slips it would be important to make definite the line-ends or 'stops', before the vertical downstrokes were made.

5: 14. The line-ends of IEMB I1 Bais(1), the Beladore inscription from Ille-et-Vilaine, Brittany. A contrasting method of making safe line ends, bored with an auger or bow drill in the softer rocks, more likely to spall when worked. As the safety stops could be joined with a repeatedly scored line, the method might be called 'bore and score'.

7: 14. Diagram showing the springs of uncial M, and epigraphic adaptations.

7:15. Diagram showing incised strokes influenced by pen-forms in some inscribed Ms of ECMW Groups I and II; these three penned diagrams show versions of letters already illustrated in 7: 2.

AVI-MONO MENT-

7: 16. The Aviti Monomenti inscription from Santon, Isle of Man. This is a Group I inscription, carefully designed, but earlier in style than the Catamanus inscription, this may be among the first Insular inscriptions where a letterer has deliberately contrasted a pen-formed M with an angular epigraphic one.

7: 17. The Herebericht inscription from Monkwearmouth, (A-S N-RI, no. 922, II).

7: 18A. Geometric letters from the Lindisfarne Gospels, showing the asymmetrical top serifs manipulated in a calligraphic pen-formed manner, and, B, geometric letters from the Lichfield Gospels showing the top serifs starkly angular and symmetrical.

8: 1.A, R. A. S. Macalister's ten-fold typological division of the slabs at Clonmacnoise was simplified by R. Ó Floinn into the three major Types which he classified as A, small panelled cross slabs [Macalister's Type 5], B, expansional crosses [Macalister's Type 8] and C, the ringed or 'Celtic' cross [Macalister's Type 7]; ILLUS. 8: 1B, shows Macalisters division of the letterforms of the slabs into four alphabets. His handwritten diagram does not make clear the improvement in lettering skills with the transition from alphabet i, the letters contemporary with the small panelled crosses, and the more calligraphic alphabets of ii-iv, employed in the later expansional and ringed crosses.

Examples from Clonmacnoise of the transition from crude, roughly two-line inscriptions in stone in mixed-alphabet style, to those incorporating angularised minuscule letters that we find later, in a more exaggeratedly angular form, in the geometric display alphabet. See the lining up of the minuscule d with the g in 8: 5A, CIIC 642, and the more fluent r, h and s of 8: 5B, CIIC no.675, accompanying a ringed cross design which may plausibly be associated with an Abbot of Clonmacnoise who died AD 720+.

9: 22 A, MS Leiden, Voss. Lat. F. 4, f 9v. showing the gradual abandonment of strict geometric display letters for more fantastically shaped forms, though in the display letter C we still find a letter from the Type C alphabet; B, from f.20 v. in the same manuscript shows that the fantastic decoration was of a higher standard than the display lettering.

9: 23 A, the christi autem from London BL, Royal 1. B. VII, f. 15v, showing the mistaken use of pi as a Greek version of roman 'R' in XPI, and the bungling of the geometric 'A' of autem as an 'H' form. These are signs that scribes no longer had command of a system. The line of display script from the same MS CHECK ALEX f, shows a Quoniam that mixes a gate M with a Type C O and a fancifully deformed A.

9: 26. Late geometric capitals in the McRegol Gospels, showing the page layout as a diagram. Although the scribe has an understanding of individual letter shapes he masses them in such a way as to make them too dense to read at all easily.

9: 27A, Geometric display letters still being used in the Gospels of MacDurnan, with a minuscule manuscript hand; although the understanding of balance in shape has been lost, this design still adheres to the mixed alphabet system, seen in the Book of Kells, of alternating curvilinear and geometric letters; and B, shows the use of geometric letters in the heading ‘(Ap)OCALYPSI(S)’ in the Book of Armagh, a manuscript written in accomplished minuscule.

9: 28. The Leningrad Gospels employs three different rubricators for its display capitals: A shows disinegration and an inclination to the curvilinear, B shows a more strictly integrated geometric style, retaining three-bar 'M', and C approaches each letter as a separate work.

10: 17A. The Llanlleonfel inscription, ECMW no.62, compared to the St Paul's Jarrow dedication slab, 10:17B, Okasha 61. Equally ambitious, the Roman-style letters of the St Paul's inscription contrast with the freer mixed-alphabet composition of the Llanlleonfel design. The core of forms of the latter, with their oblong-based U, P, C, M, S and T, their angularised minuscule 'r' and 's' create a monumental effect that is utterly different to the Jarrow inscription. It uses manuscript contractions and emerges from a book-using milieu that has taken its monumental letter models from a vernacular book rather than a Roman monument.

1. To show brush lettering on stone, and the effect of 1. Rolling the brush into a stroke-entry
2. Lifting off the brush, as the stroke is pulled, to achieve a thinning 'tail'
3. Brushed letters on a poor-surfaced Pennant sandstone showing rolled entry into 'l' and the effect of halting the stroke with the stock in full contact with the surface, at the finish of the 'e' bow and the 'eg' ligature bar, producing the clotting of paint that gives a lobed line-end.

2. Light cursive letters written with a stylus in clay, showing the effect of stylus writing in wax. Looped entries are freely made. 1. Shows the ligaturing of 'e' and the square-footed turn out of the 'l' which is a feature of Rustic written with a stylus. 2. Showing the extent to which curved strokes may be thrown with ease, in the 'b', and the 'ec' ligature which we find transferred to stone in the period before the establishment of a canonical half-uncial.

3. Replica votive plaques cut in clay with a chip-carving knife. Once hard it was possible to make foil impressions from the surface of the clay. A. The alpha shows a different solution to the avoidance of a straight bar joining the diagonals. B. The common solution of angle-bar alpha is shown in this example.

4. Rubbings of two examples of the letter 'I', cut in seasoned oak on vertical grain, once with a stop at each end and once without stops. On a three inch letter, such as this, if the downstroke was not provided with stops, then the stroke ripped up the grain of the wood by about half an inch in each case.

5. Line endings knife-cut in wood. 1. Well seasoned fine-grain pine showing the kind of pyramidal stop used by woodcarvers such as that found on the Lemanaghan bog staff.

2. Poor quality softwood showing simple angled stops with a curved cut into the downstroke from each end.

7. Letter 'E' shown cut in 1. Quarella stone, to demonstrate the advantage of isolating the serifs from the secondary strokes. 2. Cut in pine down the grain, showing the sharpness of cut across the grain, and the relative softness down it.

8. A. Letter 'A' knife-cut in steatite (Shetland soapstone), showing the clean detail possible without chisel work B. Showing a well-defined impression from the above in clay.

A

9. Rubbing from an ogham inscription in Sutton stone, showing 1. the destruction of the arris, rendering the ogham illegible when strokes are hammered right up to the edge. 2. An 'X' shaped ogham character with the diagonals intersecting on the arris, showing similar destruction.

10. Experimental ogham characters in A. Sutton stone made by scoring rather than chiselling, resulting in less destruction of the arris. B. Three ogham strokes taken to the edge of an adamantine whinstone, made by violent chiselling. It was not possible to damage the arris.

11. Letters made using the bore and score technique, replicating the Brittany 'Beladore' inscription. 1. Isle of Man shaley slate. The surface of this stone makes it necessary to mark the ends of the letterform first, to prevent slipping. Boring by drill or awl is an effective method of limiting the scores. 2. The same letters bored and scored in fine quality Bethesda slate.

12. Letters cut with a round-end chisel in Bloomhill sandstone, from Clonmacnoise, showing the finish possible with a tool that is not sharp-edged. The bifurcated serif in B was made with no spalling at the junction with the bow of 'h'. The angular letters of A were significantly easier and quicker to incise.
